Ohio State established its innovative and high impact Global One Health paradigm in 2014. As we enter a new decade, the world continues to face increases in emerging and re-emerging communicable diseases as well as a surge of non-communicable hazards at the interface of humans, animals, plants and the environment.

The emergence of the SARS-CoV-2 pandemic illustrates the need for intersectional collaboration and knowledge to meet emerging threats. With our 2020 biennial conference, we aim to bring global stakeholders (campus, local, state, national and international) together to discuss priority global health capacity needs, current challenges, and progress towards sustained prevention and control. The conference is organized as part of GOHi’s strategic effort to build outreach and extension capacity.

The objectives of this conference are to:

- Highlight the need for strengthened training, research and outreach capacity to address complex issues pertinent to human, animals, plants and the environment

- Foster collaboration for effective and sustained capacity building/strengthening

- Showcase the diverse projects GOHi and global partners are working on to make an impact around the world

- Bring together key local, state, national and international stakeholders to facilitate knowledge-sharing
